

Potosa Spa

Be true to your soul

Potosa Spa

The world's most sought after spas share one endearing trait- a deep and authentic connection to the community, they call home. The bond may be to the land, or an indigenous people or even a mystery unsolved. At Potosa Spa, there are links to all three.

The spa is named in honor of Potosa, daughter of Peosta, the chief of the Meskwaki or Fox Native American tribe that inhabited this area now known as Dubuque. Legend has it she was also the wife of Julien Dubuque, the town's namesake and friend to the Fox. In what some storytellers have called "a great romance of the Old West," Julien purportedly stole Potosa under cover of night from a neighboring tribe, where she had been promised in marriage to the chief's son. In a personal letter, Dubuque referred to a "Madam Dubuque" yet there was no mention of a wife when his estate was settled upon his death in 1810, giving rise to the belief that if a wife existed she was a Native American who returned to her tribe after his death.

Today, you'll find treatments at Potosa Spa that are inspired by the Native American Medicine Wheel, drawing from the four directions and four elements of earth, wind, water, and fire.

*As you journey through life take good care to listen to your heart and
be true to your soul.*
